

Matt Mullican

On Thursday 11 December at 19:00 PRAXES presents “The Second Meaning of Things (performance)”, a new work by Matt Mullican. This evening culminates a months-long focus at PRAXES, narrowing in on notions of the “Second Person” through transitory exhibitions, performances, lectures, and conversations.

Articulated in a range of formats from photographs, pencil drawings, performances, texts, and pictographic charts, Matt Mullican has continuously tracked the constructions of our subjective realities by repeatedly transgressing into and testing our relationship with the imaginary. Drawing on his long-term investigation of the frameworks of perception, the initial exhibition at PRAXES, “Third Person”—on display in August and September—focused on the third-person point of view and its narrative variations and potentials as explored in Mullican’s work from the early 1970s to today. Running from mid-October, this present exhibition module, “Second Person”, turns to a subject that the artist is currently examining, namely that of the “you” in his practice.

Probing and unfolding a hypothesis of strengthened identification with an imaginary character through a second-person point of view, the exhibition space becomes a vehicle for Mullican to address audiences directly in performances, lectures, and conversations. PRAXES offers itself to Mullican and audiences as a collective research facility. The one-off activities are accompanied by a series of accumulated displays of performances props, archival material, documentation, and artworks related to the unfolding investigation.
